With Dignity he SHEARS his Trials!

◇ HISTORY OF '93. ◇

Such unfading interest does the story of the golden epoch of college days possess, that the present historian feels that an abler pen should have the task of delineating them. Especially interesting is the period we are called on to describe, for, it is in the Junior year that Science begins to unroll before the student her splendid panorama, and there enters unto him, "The fairy tales of Science, and the long results of Time."

Gibbon, the atheist, said that history was little more than the register of the crimes, follies, and misfortunes of mankind. Viewing the subject pessimistically, his statement may appear to be true, but the history of the class of '93, correctly told, is a most convincing refutation. This is said, be it understood, not in a spirit of heedless boasting, but it is the conclusion reached after unprejudiced examination of the history of those events and enterprises, which, during the past three years have received the most attention from the college.

In politics, in society, in athletics, in the pursuit of knowledge, and in all the various occupations of college, not excepting "innocent amusements," we stand preeminent.

In the political revolution of this year, which resulted in changing the selection of anniversarian from the exciting method of balloting to the more peaceful one of competition before judges, '93, through certain of her members, took a most conspicuous part.

In athletics, the record is one to be proud of. The hard-fought base ball contest last term for the championship resulted in our brilliant victory. The defeat which Emory college suffered last spring at the hands of the University nine is due largely to the work of the men '93 contributed to the team.

And on that memorable day, when Mercer, in all the pride of the brand-new yell, and all the gayety of its black and "yeller" brought up its burly foot ball team to give us battle, and when the black and yellow went down in the dust of utter defeat and the black and crimson waved in triumphant victory, '93 shared proudly in the triumph, for in the result the work of the men she had given to the team was a potent factor.

In the membership of the Glee Club, that heroic little band which sang so bravely and so well in the cause of the college gymnasium, '93 claims some of the most talented.

Last of our achievements, but not least, are in the class room, where progresses the dull monotony of examination and recitation. Here, in the language of the prize-ring, many a professor has been "knocked out" and acknowledged the prowess of '93.

At this writing, the year has not been entirely completed, and so the whole of the history of '93 may not be told. For, in regard to this class, it is very true, that we know not what a day will bring forth.

Best however of all the things we boast is the strong comradeship which binds us together. This shall not end with graduation, but will accompany us into the world beyond—this, we all regard as the most valuable thing we found on our way through the University of Georgia.
