* * * History of the Senior Class. * * *

FOUR years ago, in the very heart of the great financial panic, forty-nine youngsters met on the campus of the University of Georgia and banded themselves together with a high purpose and a firm determination. The crash of banks and the cry of hard times never deterred them from planking down the necessary coin to achieve success in their undertaking. They were known as Freshmen then, and their purpose was to win for themselves great honor and make the University proud of her sons.

The theory of evolution receives new support from the history of that class, for who would recognize in the lordly Seniors of to-day the Freshmen of 1893.

They were mere college lads four years since; now they are ready to enter the battle of life, well-equipped for its struggles and armed with the most powerful weapon of warfare, intellectual training and culture.

In the Sophomore year this class had seventy-four members; in the Junior year fifty-six; in this, the graduating year it has forty-six members and is one of the largest Senior classes the University ever had. With no desire to praise where merit is not present; with no wish to cover with flattery fault or error; it becomes my duty, as historian of the Senior class, to paint in modest colors the picture of their achievements and in unpretentious phrase to tell the story of their college work.

To a splendid record as students in their Freshman year they added new laurels as Sophomores. While in that class the curriculum of the University was raised, and the studies of the Sophomore class became much harder than usual. Nothing daunted by the increased requirements of study, they entered faithfully upon their work and achieved success.

As orators the members of the Senior class have always stood at the forefront. It was the verdict of all present at the Chapel in 1895 that the Sophomore speeches of that Commencement season were the best ever delivered from the college rostrum.

The members of the class of '97 have reason to be proud of the interest they have always taken in the literary societies. To their eloquent voices and logical reasonings is due in no small degree the movement inaugurated this year to bring about the glorious renaissance of oratory at the University of Georgia, and as a result of the zeal felt by its members for debating, the class of '97 furnished last year two of the leading champion debaters.

In literary and journalistic circles the members of the class of '97 have achieved much reputation and at present the editor-in-chief of both our monthly magazine and our weekly paper are among its members.

In athletics '97 has stood pre-eminent since the Freshman year, having the winning team in the class games of football and the best baseball team in college. In our Sophomore year we furnished three of the 'Varsity football eleven, three in the Junior year, and four in the Senior year. This year we have the captain of the baseball team; while in track athletics several of our members have broken hitherto existing college records.

But the end of college days must come, and the student must emerge from the halls of his Alma Mater to assume the duties of citizenship. The members of '97 have almost reached the parting of the ways, and the familiar scenes of the old campus must take their places in the halls of memory.

The Class of '97 faces the future with no misgivings. Grateful to the University of Georgia for its invaluable educational training, bound to each professor by the ties of enduring friendship, we shall soon go forth to earn reputations for ourselves.

The passing years will no doubt bring many changes. The raven locks will sooner or later be silvered by the frost of time; the sparkling eyes will be dimmed; the noble brows will be furrowed; the strong limbs will be enfeebled. But throughout all changes, the memories of our college days will remain fragrant and refreshing.

The members of '97 will go into different fields of labor, will be separated no doubt by many miles of space, and many will never meet again on this side of eternity. Yet in the after years, as memory turns their thoughts backward to the days of long ago, they will all respond in the words of the immortal bard:

“Let Fate do her worst, there are relics of joy,
Bright dreams of the past which she can not destroy;
Which come in the night-time of sorrow and care,
And bring back the features that joy used to wear;
Long, long be my heart with such memories filled,
Like the vase in which roses have once been distilled,
You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang 'round still.”

T. K. SLAUGHTER.
