♦ ♦ ♦ Junior History. ♦ ♦ ♦

TIME in its ceaseless passage leaves along its trail scattered fragments that tell of a once living present that has blended itself with the past—that awful depository of the dead. In whatever time, under whatever circumstances, he may live, it is the duty of the historian faithfully to gather these scattered fragments together and weave them candidly into a true story that shall truthfully depict to the world the time of which he writes; not alone of its glories, its achievements, or its possible reverses, but also of the latent causes that have silently wrought out these results. Reasoning from these causes and the effects they have already produced, it is further his duty as well as his privilege to draw well-defined conclusions as to their final outcome both upon the age that gave them origin and the indefinite future.

For three years a band of about fifty of Georgia's best young men have gone from day to day to the various recitation halls on our campus that are prescribed by that revered assembly, our Faculty. That the individuals of this band have merited the compliments heaped on their perseverance and their success is no wonder when it is known that they were gathered together, some from the neatly-curved plow-handles, some from the schoolroom where they had acted the parts both of pupil and teacher, and some from the cultured ease of society's dreamy life. Varied as their pasts had been they met on common ground for the one common purpose of developing intellectuality.

As Freshmen, this band of '98 never shirked a duty. Oh, how proud we felt when, arrayed in our button-bespangled uniforms, we first answered "here" to the sergeant's roll-call and bravely stepped forward at the sound "green squad, fall out!"

In the balmy springtime of 1895 we wandered pensively over the hills and through the vales that surround our little city like philosophers of old and bards of all times, only we were under command of our professor of botany.

Flushed with the dignity of Sophomore, we were shown into a small brick building "where the ivy clingeth," and there we were confronted by a spectacled monster whose knowledge passed all understanding. "To be or not to be" was the lowering cloud that overshadowed our destiny for that one long year, and at last as the session drew nigh unto its close, we looked into the majestic calm of its serene countenance, but it only murmured, "Ay, at Phillippi."

There are some who linked their destinies at first with ours, but who have already cast themselves upon the flood of human existence. To them we extend a cordial hand of brotherhood, and hope for them that brilliant success they are so earnestly seeking.

There is another one of our Class who is with us now no more. The God who gave him his sunny nature and his penetrating intellect called him home in the flower of his young manhood to worship at a worthier shrine than the fame of human ambition.

Perhaps men may be found in other Classes more brilliant than those who complete our ranks, but never will more honest men be discovered. There have been times in our career when the mists of suspicion hung over us low ; then it was that the men of '98 stood firmly together and demanded that justice be meted out to the guilty and the guilty only, and our fair name be vindicated.

The present is fast gliding away. Soon the men of '98 will be launched on the sea of life for weal or for woe. Although futurity is a sealed mystery that no man knoweth, yet we feel safe in judging the future of '98 by its past. The men who constitute its numbers have hitherto shown themselves peerless in the class-room, invincible in athletics, unsurpassed in oratory, profound in thought, and lucid in the exposition of thought. Such college men as these are the thinkers and the actors who sway the minds and shape the actions of the next generation. In whatever department of life they may cast their lot, we are sure that our classmates will always be found in the foremost ranks of their chosen occupations ; in politics, champions of the people's rights ; in commercial industries, promoters of public welfare ; in science, the clearest thinkers and the most patient investigators ; in religion and education, noblest among the benefactors who seek for humanity the highest earthly attainment, ideal, moral and mental culture.

In union there is strength. The Class of '98 early learned this truth and bound closely the ties of common brotherhood. May this fraternal spirit abide ever in the breasts of our loyal classmates, linking heart to heart as we drift adown the current of life. This done, we know that the names of those of '98 will be written high on the scroll of fame immortal.

WM. FRANCIS UPSHAW.
