What Julius Caesar Missed.

Julius Cæsar was considered a great man, and so he was, but he had his limitations. He dined off of golden plates and drank out of golden tankards, and enjoyed many things quite up to the present date, but no electric light brightened his home or dazzled his eyes, nor had he even the glow of a good kerosene lamp. He never rode a bicycle or spoke through a telephone. He never sent or received a telegram, and never rode on a railway train. He never listened to a phonograph or had his picture taken by a kodak. He never took a header from a bicycle, and, worst of all, he never had the pleasure of examining the contents of D. W. McGregor's Book-store. The book-shops of his time overlooked the elegant line of Books, Stationery, Novelties, Articles of Utility, Blank-Books, etc., that we carry in such large profusion—and we cordially invite you to take advantage of what the first and only conqueror of the English missed so badly. We will make prices to suit you.
